Dear Department Chair,

I am a student in the language department. First, I'd like to thank the department for providing the free materials to help students learn foreign languages. Last semester, I took some of the courses, and I found the materials really helped me.

Second, I recently noticed that not many students know about these books and videos, etc. Maybe the department could organize some fun events to promote these free resources more. This would help more students benefit from this valuable service.

Sincerely,

Alice Lin

According to the first chart, more than half of the students are concerned with the lack of social interaction during online courses. Students' second biggest concern is that they are unable to focus in class. The second chart shows that teachers who teach online courses find it most challenging to keep students engaged. Meanwhile, thirty percent of teachers think that it is difficult to adjust their teaching methods for online classes.

In my view, online learning should be a regular part of school instruction for two reasons. First, online teaching became common during the COVID-19 pandemic, and both teachers and students adapted well. Second, online classes offer convenience. Thanks to the Internet, students have access to teaching from the best schools around the world from their own homes.

All in all, online learning has proven to be an important and necessary trend in school instruction. If the disadvantages shown in the charts above can be overcome, online courses will be extremely beneficial for both teachers and students.
